By Laine Welch
 Lost in the headlines about the hits to seafood sales from the Trump Administration's trade war with China is another international barrier with Russia that's been going on far longer.
 In August of 2014 Russia placed an embargo on all U.S. food products to retaliate for sanctions the U.S. and other Western countries imposed over the invasion of Ukraine. The ban included Alaska seafood, which at the time accounted for more than $61 million in annual sales to Russia, primarily from pink salmon roe. But here's the bigger hurt: For the nearly six years that the embargo has been in place, no corresponding limits have ever been imposed on Russian seafood coming into the U.S.

 At first, Alaska seafood companies and the Congressional delegation made some "tit for tat" noise about imposing a ban on Russian seafood. But in fact, the value of Russian imports has grown nearly 70 percent since 2014 - and it all comes into the U.S. almost entirely duty free.

 A four-page white paper from the Alaska Seafood Marketing Institute outlines the trade imbalance further. For example, the U.S. imported $551 million of seafood from Russia in 2018, plus $50 million of pollock from China that was caught in Russia. U.S. crab comprised 84 percent of the value of Russian imports just in that one year. Through December 2019, the numbers increased again - federal trade data show that more than 80.2 million pounds of Russian seafood entered the U.S. valued at over $698 million. That included nearly 16 million pounds of red king crab valued at $293 million and 4.6 million pounds of frozen sockeye salmon worth over $16.7 million.

 Alaska and Russia harvest many of the same fish and crab species, and many Russian seafood products compete in the U.S. at much lower prices. The trade report reveals how ASMI worked aggressively to build markets in Russia starting in 2006, and steady growth boosted Alaska pink salmon prices from 2010 through 2013 which benefitted fish-

Trooper Beat

On Feb. 10, 2020 at approximately 2:55 a.m., VPSO Dan Harrelson in White Mountain advised that search and rescue crews from both Golovin and White Mountain responded and were on scene where three individuals on two different ATV had gotten stuck and were trapped in overflow in Golovin Bay. All three individuals, 29-year-old Joseph Fagundes, 27-year-old Stephanie Fahey and 23-year-old Adrian Barr Jr., all from White Mountain, were reportedly standing on top of their four wheelers, which were submerged in open water. At approximately 5:37 a.m., air assistance was requested after attempt to rescue the individuals by boat were unsuccessful. At approximately 7:23 a.m., VPSO Harrelson reported that all three individuals were rescued by searchers using a canoe. Two of the three people were taken to the White Mountain clinic for medical treatment.
