infrastructure as another challenge. "So much of the Alaska seafood infrastructure was built in the 1970s and 1980s, and it's all getting old. At the same time, we need to have the retained earnings, we need to have the support, we need to have the capital investment to continue to make those investments to revitalize the industry or we're going to lose all those community benefits," Fanning, who is chief executive office of the Aleutian Pribilof Island Community Development Association, told the RDC audience. Five seafood plants have closed in the past four years, dealing devastating blows to those communities, Fanning said.

A modernization in the works? There was some consensus among speakers at the two-day task force hearing, as well as panel speakers at the RDC conference, about certain solutions. They want more rigorous fishery and environmental science and the funding it would require. They want continued and enhanced federal trade policies to counter what they say are unfair practices by Russia and other players. Last year's executive order barring imports of Russian fish processed in other countries is an example of desired trade policies, Bundrant said. Legislative task force members have zeroed in on the Alaska Seafood Marketing Institute, an industry-funded state agency, as critical to any solution. Senate President Gary Stevens, R-Kodiak, the chair of the task force, noted that lawmakers approved increased funding for ASMI last year, but that Gov. Mike Dunleavy vetoed the increase.

"I think it'll be added back into the budget this coming session," Stevens said during the second day of last week's hearing. "We realize how important it is, that marketing is an important issue." ASMI's role in fixing the industry problems may require more than funding, some task force members suggested. There could be a need for restructuring the agency or expanding its authority, they said. The task force heard ideas about investment projects and technological innovations, like an energy efficient, at-sea fast-freeze system used by fishers in Iceland. Kristy Clement, chief executive officer of the Alaska Fisheries Development Foundation, made a presentation on Wednesday about the nonprofit organization's ongoing initiative for top-to-bottom modernization of the industry. The initiative was launched at an AFDF board meeting last February, she said. The first task is better data collection, which has already started, Clement said. The foundation has contracted with McKinley Research for a detailed seafood processor business model and cost analysis, expected to be completed early next year, she said. Other elements of the initiative include new product development and enhanced marketing. To that end, the foundation has expanded its Alaska Symphony of Seafood event to give it a more global focus, she said. The event showcases new products and menu items made with Alaska sea-
